Do a little research and get in touch with the neighbours to know what could be interesting for all.

To do so, some community members are asked to take pictures of (for example):

- positive aspects in the neighbourhood/community;
- negative aspects in the neighbourhood/community;
- existing solutions for problems in the neighbourhood/community;
- characteristics of the neighbourhood/community, for example social use of space.

Once these pictures are taken, they bring them back to you and explain what they photographed and especially why they did it.

The interest of proceeding like this is that depending on your age, gender or culture, problems could be perceived differently. This method allows for different perspectives within the same community and therefore allows for a greater number of social issues to be considered/identified. Ensure that you have the photographers' consent to use their photos and you need a trust environment. Focus on the issues and avoid showing faces as much as possible: some photos showing important issues could have a big impact, so protect the photographers involved and their privacy.

Then you have to decide how to use these pictures:

- Online: blogs, websites, a page dedicated to social media,…
- Exhibition
- Analysis material for Urban planning
